According to the BBB Code of Advertising:

When the term "warranty" (or "guarantee") is used in product advertising, the following disclosure should be made clearly and prominently: a statement that the complete details of the warranty can be seen at the advertiser's store prior to sale, or in the case of mail or telephone order sales, are available free on written request.

When the term "lifetime," "life" or similar representations are used in advertising to describe the duration of the warranty or guarantee, the advertisement should clearly and prominently disclose the life to which the representation refers.

"Satisfaction Guarantee", "money back guarantee", "free trial offer", or similar representations should be used in advertising only if the seller or manufacturer refunds the full purchase price of the advertised product at the purchaser's request.

Claims as to energy savings, performance, safety, efficacy, results, etc. which will be obtained by or realized from a particular product or service should be based on recent and competent scientific, engineering, or other objective data.

Product result claims must be substantiated.

In general, advertising which used testimonials or endorsements may not be misleading or confusing. Advertisers should consult Federal Trade Commission Guides on Testimonials and Endorsements for detailed guidance.

BBB found that these claims were in violation of the BBB Code of Advertising. As of February 27, 2013, the business has failed to respond to BBB or modify their advertising.
