The Miracle Of Resveratrol

The Miracle Clinical Discovery

Resveratrol and it Health Benefits.

The biggest medical discovery since antibiotics!

"This could arguably be the biggest medical discovery since antibiotics!" Recently Harvard University released a clinical study proving that a compound found in red wine called Resveratrol"

"Recent research has indicated substance called resveratrol, which is found in the skin and seeds of grapes used to make wine, has promising heart-healthy benefits."

The modern wonder substance found in red wines and grape skins Resveratrol has been shown to possess excellent health-promoting and therapeutic properties at the cellular level that can effectively slow down the aging process.

Many of these studies also provide a body of evidence that it has anti-carcinogenic properties in some types of cancer cells at higher doses. Its main benefit is reducing cholesterol levels that account for the French paradox we've heard about.

For those who haven't, it's a paradox of eating more fatty foods and still gets healthier and longer lives compared with Americans who consume as much. It's attributed to the Resveratrol substance in the red wines that French and other European peoples consume with their meals while Americans prefer soda.

Red Wine Ingredient Resveratrol Stops Breast Cancer Growth, Study Suggests

ScienceDaily (Sep. 29, 2011) — A new research report appearing in the October 2011 issue of The FASEB Journal shows that resveratrol, the "healthy" ingredient in red wine, stops breast cancer cells from growing by blocking the growth effects of estrogen. This discovery, made by a team of American and Italian scientists, suggests for the first time that resveratrol is able to counteract the malignant progression since it

What is the CAP-e Testing?

(Cell-based Antioxidant Protection in Erythrocytes)

The CAP-e assay (Cell-based Antioxidant Protection in Erythrocytes) is a new method for evaluating the antioxidant potential of natural products based on the concept that many such antioxidant products are only of biological relevance if they are able to protect living cells. In other words, it is a cell-based assay for the evaluation of whether antioxidants in natural products are capable of protecting live cells from oxidative damage - it is designed to measure the antioxidant bioavailability of a product at a cellular level.

The erythrocyte, red blood cell (RBC), model was chosen for the CAP-e test because RBCs are simple and stable cells, and biologically relevant for antioxidant protection in the body. The RBC does not perform cellular signalling, undergo apoptosis, or produce reactive oxygen species, whereas all other cell types used in cell-based assays can.

Many test types used for measuring antioxidants have limited relevance for understanding the biological effects of antioxidants. Therefore, the relevance of antioxidants and antioxidant testing, especially as it relates to marketing claims in the Natural Products Industry, has come into question. However, with the introduction of the CAP-e that has changed.

Data from the CAP-e assay can be used to make the following statement: "Antioxidants in your product can protect live cells". Further, data from the Certified Bioavailable Antioxidants Program involves clinical testing after consumption, and can be used to make the following statement: "Antioxidants in your product are bioavailable in humans".

Antioxidant Testing

What does the "antioxidant capacity" of a product mean?

The answer depends on the environment in which it is tested.

1. You can test the product itself. (Is there antioxidant activity in a given chemical reaction?)
2. You can test the product in a "cell-based system". (Do any of the potential antioxidants get into the cells?)
3. You can test the product in a human. (Do any of the potential antioxidants find their way into serum?)

Most products that use antioxidants as a marketing claim today base their claims on the first kind of test. This was for a good reason, because until recently it was quite expensive to do batch-to-batch tests in a "cell-based system".

With the introduction of the CAP-e, "cell-based testing" is now an affordable next step or alternative to the "chemical-based" methods.

Study Design for CAP-e Testing

The CAP-e assay is performed by allowing red blood cells to absorb antioxidants from a physiological liquid containing soluble product. All compounds not absorbed into the cell are then removed. The cell is exposed to oxidative stress. An indicator dye shows the degree of intracellular damage to the cell, in the presence versus absence of serial dilutions of the test product.
