

Multiple Sclerosis (MS)

February 14, 2009 Merenna Morrow Testimonials

Hi, there!

I have a personal testimony that I would like to share, in the hopes that it might help others out there that might be having the same problems. I was diagnosed with Multiple Sclerosis (MS) about 8 years ago. I started taking GNLD a little while after that, and, according to my MRI, the MS was going away. Apparently, it moves around a little bit, but the Dr. sounded a bit surprised when he called with the last results and said that the previous lesions (in the brain) were practically gone, and I did have small new ones in my spine. I'd venture to guess that they're gone as well now, based on my symptoms (or lack thereof).

I do remember going to the Dr. one time (after my diagnosis) because of trouble in my legs (after the birth of my now 5 year old), and reading a pamphlet in his office about a great new medicine to help people with MS. I went straight for the "ingredients" list and found the active helpful components to be three amino acids (and I thought, "my protein shake has all 22!"). Well, I had been trying to cut down on my GNLD (due to my husband's concern about the $$ I was spending), and one of those things I had stopped taking was the Nourishake. The Dr. that day (Thursday) wanted to put me on medicine and I balked at that idea. He told me to come back Monday after I had "considered" it so he could start me on it, and that it was really helpful to take this medicine and I would get over this exacerbation faster. Well, I went home and started drinking my Nourishake again, and never went back on that Monday, because I was no longer having any trouble with my legs. I won't say I have absolutely no symptoms — there is fatigue that is very annoying and a few other very minor things, but I do thank God that He did point me in the right direction (GNLD) in how to handle my situation.
